H-E-B Gift

The Brackenridge Park Conservancy is the recipient of a $1 million gift from H-E-B to create the H-E-B Cultural Trail, a new ADA-accessible pathway that will tell the story of Brackenridge Park's historic treasures.

public spaces where our community can gather, play, and learn.

The H-E-B Cultural Trail will be a self-guided experience that will encourage visitors to explore the 12,000 years of the rich history found in the Park. Educational signage featuring historic photos and bilingual text will tell the story from indigenous peoples to present day cultural groups.

"Brackenridge Park is essential to the fabric of San Antonio and holds special memories for generations of families and South Texans," said Julie Bedingfield, H-E-B public affairs manager. "H-E-B is passionate about investing in

"We're thrilled to partner with the Brackenridge Park Conservancy to provide a new way for future generations to experience this historical mainstay," she said.

"I express our deep gratitude to H-E-B for its meaningful impact on the renaissance of the 123-year old Park," said Lukin T. Gilliland, Jr, BPC vice president. "The partnership with an established and beloved company like H-E-B elevates the importance of the work of the Brackenridge Park Conservancy."

Why Things Are

Pump House No. 1 & No. 2

Pump House No. 1 in the 1940s
One of oldest existing commercial buildings in San Antonio

As San Antonio grew in the mid-19th century, the increased population meant increased water contamination and bouts of cholera.

To address this public health crisis, City leaders awarded a contract to J.B. Lacoste's San Antonio Water Works Company in 1877 "to construct a water works to supply the city of San Antonio with water for fire protection, sanitary, public and domestic purposes."

LaCoste's contract also required construction of a reservoir to provide a backup water supply of five million gallons.

A raceway was excavated, and the one-story stone Pump House No. 1 was built, "with an eye to beauty as well as use". The 40-foot-wide raceway began on the San Antonio River's west bank near the dam of the Upper Labor acequia, crossed the old tannery property, and re-entered the river at the pump house about 650 feet to the south. The raceway's nine-foot fall provided power to drive turbines and pumps.

The pump house operated on gravity and velocity to activate the pumping operations and to force water to the reservoir that was located near where the San Antonio Botanical Garden stands today. Gravity flow delivered the water through an extensive network of pipes that branched out into the City.

Pump House No. 2

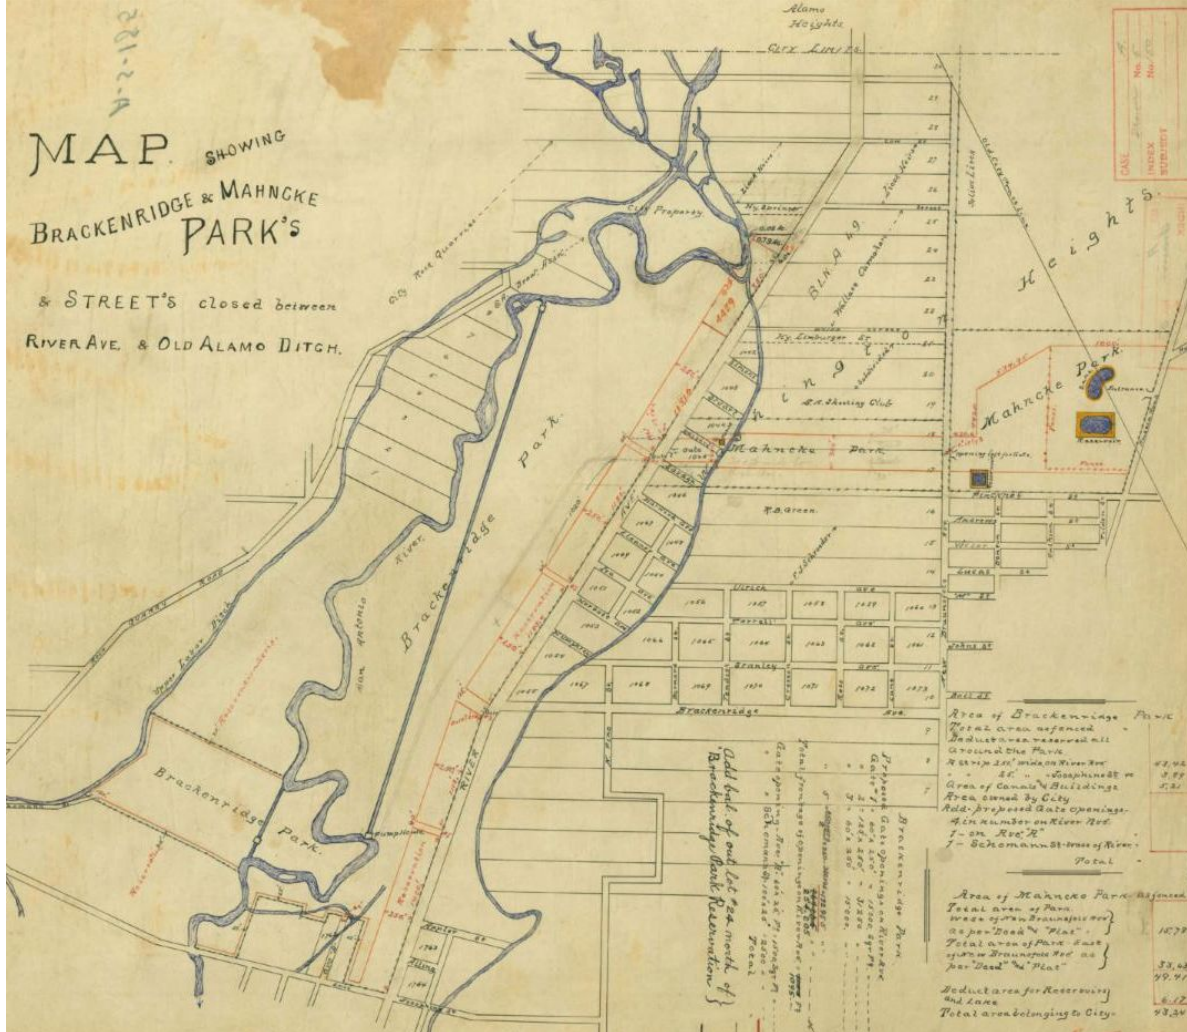

Sculptor Gutzon Borglum designed Mount Rushmore while living here in the 1930s

By 1885, George Brackenridge gained controlling interest in the Water Works company. Through company reorganization and financial investments, Brackenridge expanded the Water Works Company. Ownership of a large block of riverfront land allowed him to expand the water works.

Beginning at the original pump house, he constructed an earthen canal in the south part of the Park and a second pump house, located today on the Brackenridge Park Golf Course.

Water entered the canal from the river near Tuleta Drive. The channel was partially filled many years ago, but the right-of-way is still discernable in the wooded area.

The City of San Antonio bought the water system in 1925.

A map from 1908 shows the locations of both pumphouses, the long raceway from the river to Pump House No. 2, and the two reservoirs.
